

What is the oldest profession in the world? Some will say that a cook, some that a doctor, but only the wisest will answer that the oldest profession is a teacher. Since the dawn of mankind, each new generation has needed the experience of the previous generation. Because experience is an invaluable thing in development and evolution. Montaigne (Монтень) once said that: "It takes more intelligence to teach another than to learn oneself...". That's right. In order for each new generation to be better and smarter than the previous one, it is necessary to pass on all the mistakes and all the achievements of past years. This, in fact, is the most important thing that teachers do. Tolstoy once said that: "The easier it is for a teacher to teach, the harder it is for students to learn...". After all, teaching is not just about giving some information to children, it is a great job for which you need to give your all. All great people had teachers, but all the great criminals and villains also had teachers, didn't they? This proves that something more than just good knowledge is needed to educate a Human. Winston Churchill once said that: "School teachers have the power that prime ministers can only dream of...". These are very strong words for the Prime Minister of Great Britain. The power of the teacher is unlimited, because completely inexperienced children are sitting in front of him, from which you can make and mold anything you like. Therefore, a teacher is the most valuable profession, which few are worthy of, and people worthy of this profession are forever included in the pages of great history.
